

China

The unique challenges facing Western companies doing business in China are no less daunting than those of Chinese entities investing in the West. In both cases, the differences go beyond language, to the widely divergent business cultures and legal systems that must be navigated by people entering unfamiliar territory. Katten's China practice regularly represents both groups with a team of US- and China-qualified attorneys equally at home in both environments — we are bilingual, bicultural, and permanently based in Shanghai and Chicago.

Fluency across cultures

Investors in either group tend to be especially wary of the bewildering complexity that attends basic business practice in an alien environment. They rely on us to help them maneuver in a fluid, frictionless manner, despite the obstacles. Our versatility, contacts and experience allow them to operate effectively in both cultural contexts, even in a time of fraught relations between the US and Chinese governments. Most of these clients — both Chinese and Western — continue to honor us with long, mutually fruitful relationships.

Chinese companies in the United States

For Chinese clients seeking entry into, and operating within, the US market, the barriers to cross-border deals — and to running a business in a totally different legal framework — are formidable. Our Chinese clients place high value on our ability to serve them, not just from China, but on US soil as well. Our seamless collaboration between Shanghai and US offices affords them a level of comfort they might not otherwise attain.

US entities in China

Doing business in a planned, officially socialist economy presents Western companies — even those with considerable cross-border experience — with a maze of legal and procedural obstacles. The Chinese government takes a hands-on role in every aspect of business operations — from employment to intellectual property to technology transfer — and the regulatory issues are virtually impenetrable without savvy local advisors. Our attorneys are steeped in Chinese business and legal practices, and we maintain an extensive network of close relationships within central, regional and local governments. We are known for helping clients in the manufacturing and financial services
